IN countries where monarchy obtains the Court sets the fashions. It may fairly be assumed that in our Republic, also, the dresses worn by the mistresses of the White House have represented the best efforts of the designers of the period. Especial interest attaches therefore to the exhibit in the Smithsonian Institution, on life-size models, of dresses that were actually worn by the women who have presided over the social and domestic life of the Executive Mansion. There has been no attempt at likenesses in the lay figures. The heads and faces were modeled in plaster by H. W. Hendley of the National Museum, the features being the same in all cases, though there is some difference in the arrangement of the hair. Apart from the celebrity of the former wearers of the costumes, the collection has marked historical value as showing the various modifications and changes in women's dress from the foundation of the Republic.

WHEN the bicycle craze was at its height in this country almost all America was a wheel. Its vogue subsided almost as rapidly as it had risen, and, while still in use for business and convenience, it has been replaced as a pleasure vehicle by the motorcycle and automobile. In Amsterdam, Holland, however, the bicycle is still at the height of its popularity. The city is said to contain over 100,000 of the machines, more in proportion to its population than any city in Europe. Many households have one for every member of the family. The father rides it to business, the mother on her way to market, the boys and girls to school and playgrounds, the swain to do his courting, the tradesman to deliver his goods. It is said of the Western cowboy that he mounts his mustang to cross the street. Substitute bicycle for mustang and the same is practically true of the people of Amsterdam.

MISS BILLY BALL
of Bronx Borough.
(G. Shefferson)

IN the matter of feminine loveliness New York yields the palm to no city in the country, and her claims in this respect were justified by the bevy of beauties, all of them residents of the city, who contested for the golden apple at the indoor bathing girl revue held recently at Madison Square Garden. It was the original intention to choose one girl as the most beautiful and give her the title of "Miss New York," but before the radiant and distracting array the judges were frankly unable to decide. They compromised by selecting ten as the loveliest among the forty who remained after the elimination contests among the two hundred and fifty competitors. The prizes varied from costly gowns to an opportunity to appear in the movies, and the competition therefore was spirited. Bobbed hair was much in evidence, though the experts leaned toward untrimmed tresses as the most effective adjunct to feminine charm. Each girl was judged on all the points of perfection, in full face as well as profile, in evening gowns and bathing suits, in grace of carriage as well as charm of face and form. With all the care displayed by the judges, there was naturally much criticism of their selections, especially among the fair ones who were eliminated and their doting and irate mothers, and there were times when the experts prepared to run not walk toward the nearest exit. No casualties resulted, however, and the awards stood. Certainly among the four prize winners here presented Paris himself might hesitate before he threw the golden apple.

Love from France

PARIS—today—is a picture of mingled gayety, romance, and culture. It is nothing else than the immortal fame of French temperament lighted from the brilliant torch of French yesterdays. Such a temperament has been the soul of the most glamorous period of history, art, architecture and literature. For the literature that sprang from the pens of the French Romantic writers has never been surpassed. Into the immortal love stories of France has been poured all the passion, all the dash and daring brilliance of a nation of accomplished lovers. De Maupassant, Hugo, George Sand, the Dumas, and their contemporaries hold a unique and striking position that has never been challenged by any other powerful group of writers.
